LETTER: Setting a fine example

Jul 29, 2014 |

There is really no excuse to remain passive on the sideline and lament the numerous problems in our education system

THE article by Bob Head, "Business can effect change where it counts — in schools" (July 24), refers.

I read it with interest and would like to congratulate him on the outstanding contribution he is making to the school he is working with in Atteridgeville. The examples he provided of how his leadership ability, knowledge and business acumen are adding value are practical. His willingness to really get involved and make a difference is inspirational. His admission that he has personally also benefited in so many ways in the process aligns with my personal experience in this regard.

Mr Head undoubtedly sets an outstanding example for all of us in the business sector who are committed to the creation of a better future for all. There is really no excuse to remain passive on the sideline and lament the numerous problems in our education system. Programmes such as Partners for Possibility provide an excellent pathway for personal involvement in addressing this national priority. His letter is certainly a call to action — let's follow his outstanding example!
